The special court found no merit in the case. On the contrary, the CBI had in its charge sheet found prima facie evidence of wrongdoing by several telecom operators, while it noted that the Tatas were discriminated against, that in the execution of the dual technology, TTSL was robbed of the GSM spectrum. The investigative agency also observed that when TTSL had applied for dual technology, it was clubbed with new applicants. Some operators were given in-principle approval on 18 October 2007, a day prior to the official notification by the telecom industry. In contrast, TTSL was given approval eighty-three days after its application.

On 2 February 2012, the Supreme Court passed its verdict on the public interest litigation (PIL) on 2G spectrum allocation. The court declared the allotment of the spectrum 'unconstitutional' and 'arbitrary' and cancelled the 122 licences issued in 2008 under A. Raja. But nearly five years later, all the accused in the 2G spectrum allocation case, including Raja, were acquitted by the special court, which noted that the CBI could not furnish evidence to prove its charges. O.P. Saini, the special court judge, stated in his judgment, 'Some people created a scam by artfully arranging a few selected facts and exaggerating things beyond recognition to astronomical levels.'

With this, one of India's most shocking cases of alleged corruption that had caught many industrialists, politicians and media celebrities in its tentacles, was closed. It vindicated what Ratan had said some years earlier in his letter to Rajeev Chandrashekar: 'When the present sensational smokescreen dies down, as it will, and the true facts emerge, it will be for the people of India to determine who are the culprits that enjoy political patronage and protection and who actually subvert policy and who have dual standards. I can hold my head high and say that neither the Tata Group nor I have at any time been involved in any of these misdeeds.'
