Another heart-rending story is that of Shyam Sunder Choudhary. He was injured when a taxi full of explosives went off as he was crossing the road at Vile Parle on his way to his office. The blast left him completely paralysed. The company where he worked did not extend any relief.

Shyam's wife and sister were given skills training by the TPSWT and are working today. Shyam receives a monthly pension from the trust, which also sponsors his children's education. Even the medical cost of Shyam's parents was borne by the trust. Though Shyam is paralysed, his face lights up when his children are mentioned. 'He is alive and that is enough' and 'for us, he [Ratan] is doing more than God', says Sujatha, his sister.

Ratan's scheme helped even those from the armed forces. Praveen Kumar Teotia, who was part of the MARCOS, had been deployed to search and destroy the terrorists at the Taj. When he entered the Chambers, the hotel's business club where the terrorists were suspected to be holding hostages, the hall was dark and he took position. But just as he did, a bullet from an AK-47 assault rifle ripped his left cheek and blew his ear off. He fell to the ground with a thud.

After a few minutes, he regained consciousness and took cover behind a sofa. Suddenly, he noticed four terrorists standing together.

Praveen engaged the terrorists in single combat and with automatic bursts of fire, hit one and injured him. In the meantime, hearing the shots being fired from inside, the other commandos lobbed tear-gas bombs into the hall, preparing to attack. Unfortunately, one fell near Praveen and blinded the commando, who was already in shock. Realizing that he had no other option, he rushed to the door and was shot in the chest, but managed to make his way out, badly injured.

He was admitted to the naval hospital at Mumbai. But he was unable to fully recover from his injuries. Even after four years, his wounds oozed blood and pus and his condition became serious. As he was not able to do some specialized tasks because of his injury, he became ineligible for special allowances of the navy. This made it more difficult for him to look for treatment at a reputed private hospital.

Faced with this situation, Praveen contacted Batliwala, and the Tatas referred him to the Bombay Hospital, where he underwent three surgeries in 2013 and 2014. The TPSWT picked up the entire expense, which came to over Rs 5 lakh. If it were not for the Tatas, Praveen says that he would have not been alive to tell the story.
