But on holidays and when he was not touring, he would spoil them. He took them on long drives, removing the back seat of a Tata Indigo Marina station wagon and laying a mattress in the vacant space to make his pets comfortable. But soon, tragedy struck.

In 2008, while they were playing, Tito broke Tango's leg. The vets whom Ratan contacted had no solution to offer other than amputating the leg. Ratan was unwilling to accept the advice. He scanned the world for a vet who could save the limb. Finally, he managed to locate one in Minnesota and lost no time in flying out with Rajen to take Tango there for treatment, even though that was the time Carolyn was supposed to come to Mumbai after four decades to meet him. After five months of careful medical care, Tango's leg was saved.

By the time Ratan was nearing his last years as chairman of the group, both Tito and Tango were past their prime, but still quite active. He made it a point to regularly sit outside on his lawn with them after he returned from work and on the weekends, in the mornings and evenings, he played with his companions.

After he stepped down in 2012 as chairman, Tata Sons, he spent more time with them. When he was not playing with them in the lawn, they were in his bedroom. Towards the end of 2018, Tango was in pain with his broken leg playing up. His mobility was severely affected. It was a common sight to see Ratan seated on a chair and trying to reach a ball that they were playing with or pulling one away from them. Tito had some amount of his old energy left in him, while the imperial-looking Tango was content sitting on a carpet in the lawn, enjoying the fun.

Despite Ratan's attempts to help him, Tango died in pain in January 2019. Four days later, Tito too passed away, perhaps heartbroken from the absence of his companion of fifteen years. Ratan was very upset. He felt that their end did not have to come this early. The vet who took care of them could, perhaps, have exercised better judgement, he thought. He even wrote to the vet conveying his displeasure.

He soon got two new German Shepherds pups in 2019. Following the tradition, he named them Tito and Tango as well. They brought him great joy with their boundless energy. Ratan, who is now in his eighties, could not always keep up with them. It was usual for them to scratch him while playing and leave his hands bruised. As they grew up, there were more fights for the alpha position. Ratan's sisters, who had lost their 'beloved'
