By the end of 1982, we completed fabrication of one-and-a-half Vikas engines. That is, one fully functional engine, and another with little more than the turbo pump, but without combustion chamber and nozzle. To get the engine tested and integrated to a stage which would later be the core of India's most successful rocket PSLV was another long struggle. And that's another tale.